Food sovereignty through participatory video: Harvesting Hope in Northern Manitoba

Clearly the market food system is not working for Aboriginal people in Northern Manitoba when three-quarters of the population in Northern Manitoba's rural communities are food insecure. Extensive compromises in food selection and total food intake are documented in conjunction with more severe levels of food insecurity and poverty. A recent survey by Thompson et al found levels that were eight times higher in Northern Manitoba reserves and other communities, finding 75% food insecurity in 14 northern Manitoba communities (n=534). In fly-in communities the rates were even higher at 79%. Food access is affected by a fly-in community's lack of access to all-weather roads, which increases the final price, limits the types of food available, particularly restricting fresh fruit and vegetables and damages the food. High unemployment and low incomes with high prices for food leads to household food insecurity.

Currently public health restrictions, due to prions and other risks, prohibit selling wild game and ban free public distribution of country foods in hospitals and schools if the food has not been processed and inspected at a federal food processor. But a federal food processor is not available in northern Manitoba. As part of this presentation we will show the participatory video called "Harvesting Hope in Northern Manitoba" which looks at policy from the community level. This video features First Nation and Metis people from Northern Manitoba as well as academics and past Assembly of Manitoba Chief, Ovide Mercredi. It is a sequel to the video 'Growing Hope in Northern Manitoba' to allow a more in depth exploration of the issues based on community perspectives.

EVENT 2: Focus on Film for Development 1: 1215-1320 May 31st (jointly mounted with ESAC)

Room: Tilley 104

Harvesting Hope in Northern Manitoba

With Shirley Thompson, Asfia Gulrukh and Durdana Islam

Harvesting Hope tells the stories of Aboriginal peoples struggling to access healthy food in northern Manitoba communities. Despite the grinding poverty and many other barriers to accessing healthy food where 75% of households are food insecure, people in northern communities are growing hope. These communities are planting gardens, starting greenhouses and teaching traditional Aboriginal methods of harvesting, gardening, berry picking and fishing to children and families. In spite of restrictive policies and a lack of meaningful government support, community members are reintroducing traditional food practices. This video features First Nation and Metis people from Northern Manitoba as well as academics and past Assembly of Manitoba Chief, Ovide Mercredi. This participatory video by graduate students, Ryan Klatt and Vanessa Lozecznik, and Dr. Thompson with community input will teach and inspire.

Panel 9: Focus on the Policy-Scholarship Interface: CIDA-CASID moving forward

PLENARY ROUNDTABLE convened by CASID and CIDA

CASID and CIDA have long looked at each other and wondered how each might help the other. This panel explores this perspective structured around three questions: (i) What are the Government of Canada's policy priorities with respect to international development for which there is a need for effective policy-research discourse? (ii) How do research activities align with government policy interests? Why? How can they be more closely aligned? Should they be aligned? (iii) How might CIDA, other government departments, along with other national and international agencies, support or facilitate policy-oriented development research?

Co-Chairs: FIONA MACPHAIL, macphail@unbc.ca and ROBERT SAUDER, Robert.Sauder@ACDI-CIDA.GC.CA

Panel 14: Focus on Religion in Development Studies in Religion and International Development

For the past few years, Studies in International Development has seen several publications on the issue of religion, its influence and place in development. The object of research and the approach vary from study to study. Certain studies begin with religion’s influence of development through faith based foreign or local NGOs while others seek to understand how religious beliefs influence the “beneficiaries” understanding of development. Most agree that religion must be studied in itself (as opposed to studying it within culture), that this subject is best taken on through multidisciplinary, a shared definition of religion and that research on religion and development avoid being normative in nature.

Innovative Approaches to Teaching Development Studies

This round table-style panel will highlight innovative approaches to teaching development studies on university campuses. While much student learning takes place outside of classroom settings and off campus, especially in IDS, most development studies courses remain campus and classroom based. This panel will examine innovative approaches that addressing the challenges of engaging students with development issues and supporting their learning in our campus-based courses. Paper topics may highlight the use of new technologies or other innovative pedagogical strategies.
